gift of 17-foot-tall sculpture reinforces israel museum's longstanding relationship with kiefer

jerusalem, israel, december 18, 2025—today, the israel museum, jerusalem (imj) announced that it has received a donation of anselm kiefer's monumental sculpture die erdzeitalter (ages of the world) from collector and philanthropist martin z. margulies, who holds one of the preeminent private collections of contemporary art in the united states. facilitated by the american friends of the israel museum and the martin z. margulies foundation, the donation reflects both the museum's and margulies' longstanding relationships with the german painter and sculptor, whose work reflects the immensity of history, collective memory, and the impacts of war. die erdzeitalter (ages of the world) is on view as of today, december 18 at the israel museum, jerusalem.

die erdzeitalter (ages of the world) was created for the royal academy, london's 2014 retrospective of kiefer's work. upon the exhibition's opening, it was acquired by the esteemed collector and philanthropist martin margulies and subsequently installed in a bespoke room within the margulies collection at the warehouse, the nonprofit institution in miami, florida founded by margulies to share the collection with the public. a permanent exhibition of monumental works by kiefer has been on view at the warehouse since 2015.

die erdzeitalter (ages of the world) is an immense, 17-foot-tall sculpture consisting of an assemblage of stacked canvases, interspersed with dried sunflowers, boulders, lead books, and earth. it is flanked by two large paintings on either side with words inscribed on the surface, such as 'archaikum' and 'mesozoikum,' referring explicitly to periods of time. part totem and part funeral pyre, the work considers the poetry of ruins, and the relationship between humankind and the deep, cyclical nature of the cosmos. it evokes several themes represented within kiefer's oeuvre, with stacked layers of canvas and rubble literally referencing geological strata, as well as metaphorical references to the tower of babel and jacob's ladder.

in 1984, the israel museum's director suzanne landau mounted a solo exhibition of kiefer's work in her then-role as curator of contemporary art; kiefer's travels to israel around the exhibition inspired him to incorporate stories from the hebrew bible and the mysticism of kabbalah into his future practice. die erdzeitalter marks the fourth work by anselm kiefer acquired by the israel museum, joining mohn und gedächtnis (poppy and memory, 1989), a three-dimensional lead aircraft weighed down with oversized lead books interspersed with dry poppy plants, aaron, a 1984 painting inspired by the judean desert and the story of exodus, created especially for his exhibition at the israel museum that year, and lilit's tochter (lilith's daughters), a 1990 work focused on the jewish folkloric figure lilith—a recurring subject in kiefer's work.

"since the beginning of his artistic practice, the work of anselm kiefer has helped process complex questions around cultural memory and life in landscapes impacted by war, putting our humanity in context with the immensity and unknowability of the universe we share," said the israel museum, jerusalem's director suzanne landau. "we are deeply grateful to the margulies collection for their generosity in bringing die erdzeitalter to jerusalem and enabling our community to experience this deeply resonant, awe-inspiring work."

"one of the most important factors in donating works of art is to align with institutions that respect the artist, a principle that has guided me across over forty years of giving," said collector martin z. margulies. "i couldn't be more pleased with this incredible work becoming part of the israel museum's collection, particularly given its long history of deep engagement with kiefer's practice and its 60 years of excellence in the region."
